February-March 2025 Newsletter

As your horse's owner and caregiver, it's natural that you worry about their well-being. Are they happy? Obviously, you don't want them stressed and miserable. That can severely affect their health and performance. The best way to keep your horse happy is to learn their body language.

Unfortunately, your horse can't directly speak to you with words. They must communicate their feelings and emotions through various body signs. Once you learn how to read them, you and your horse can have an amazing relationship! You can look out for positive feelings and encourage them, while trying to decrease frustration and anxiety.

How does a happy horse act?

Relaxed: Generally, a content horse will be one that is comfortable in their surroundings. Do you know when your horse is relaxed? Keep a lookout for a droopy lower lip, cocked hind leg, closing eyes, sighs, and a lowered head. Your horse will usually display a few of these when they don't feel threatened or anxious. It could be when you're grooming them, they're grazing or eating hay, or just hanging out.

You can create a relaxed atmosphere once you know what makes your horse feel that way. Spend quality time with them to learn their triggers. And always try to make their environment stress-free!

Focused: When your horse is actively paying attention to you, then they're likely happy. A distracted horse is usually worried or stressed. The content horse will be interested in what you're doing and even tries to participate. Some simple signs include ears pointed toward you, willingness to engage in the activity, and you can hold their attention.

A focused horse is usually relaxed, as well. You want your horse calm and responding to your aids. Those that are worked up or worrying about something 'over there' are feeling negative emotions. You can help by encouraging them to pay attention to you. Ask your horse to focus by giving them something to think about. You can move their legs or work through an obstacle, for example.

Social: Watching your horse in their herd environment can tell you a lot about how they're feeling. You can look for a few things: lying down and resting, grooming another horse, playing, and grazing contently. Generally, a happy horse will engage in all of these activities at some point or another.

If your horse isn't acting like their normal self, they may be unhappy. Are they constantly on the lookout for a 'predator'? Are they pacing the fence line? Watch out for anxious or abnormal behavior.

The Many Sounds Of Horses

From neighs to nickers, horses have many different vocalizations!

Horses communicate in many ways, including vocalization and body language. Their various sounds can indicate how they feel about a situation or object. Some will be high-pitched and loud, while others are soft and rumbling. Many of their sounds can have multiple meanings, so you'll need to evaluate the situation to have a better idea of why they made the noise.

Horse Vocalizations

- Neigh/ Whinny: This sound is used to locate or maintain contact with other horses. It can be a distressed call or a greeting to a horse in the distance.
- Nicker: A softer tone, the nicker can be used to get attention, greet another horse or person, or show affection. A hungry horse may nicker when he sees his grain coming.
- Scream: Generally, two horses in conflict may emit a high-pitched, loud scream. The sound may also come out of a frightened horse.
- Snort: This sound can mean many things. Some snorts will indicate the horse is relaxed or content, while others suggest the horse is alarmed or frustrated. You'll need to evaluate the situation to determine how the horse is feeling.
- Squeal: Mares are notorious for their squeals. They can be showing annoyance or protesting the attention of a male. The squeal is usually indicative of conflict.
- Blow: Strong exhalation of air through the nostrils creates the blow sound. The horse is alerting others that there is an intruder. In other instances, the horse may just be curious.
