White Line Disease From Vetericyn

White Line Disease in Horses: Everything You Need to Know

Horse ownership can be rewarding, but can also require a special level of care that other domesticated animals might not require. They have strict feeding, exercise, and grooming needs, and when these aren't taken care of, horse owners run the risk of something going wrong. One of the most common conditions in horses is called white line disease. Let's learn more about what white line disease is, how to treat it, and tips to prevent white line disease from plaguing your horse.

What is White Line Disease in Horses?

According to Life Data Labs, white line disease is a "hoof wall invasion of common organisms in the environment." White line disease affects the medial, or middle, of the hoof wall and can be caused by invading or opportunistic fungus and bacteria (pathogens). While nearly any horse can get white line disease, the fungi is often caused by mechanical, environmental, physiological, or nutritional issues. It can also be caused by trauma to the healthy hoof tissue.

Can You Treat White Line Disease in Horses?

Luckily, you can treat white line disease in horses if it's caught early. The most common symptoms of the fungal infection include:

- Thickening of the white line on the solar surface of the affected hoof
- Abnormal percussion in areas of the hoof walls
- The outer hoof wall is the concave opposite of the affected areas
- Hoof capsule bulges above the affected areas
- Lameness in advanced stages of the fungal infection
- When treating white line disease in horses, first consider the potential source and address that. For example, proper nutrition and hoof hygiene are key.

In addition, topical products that jumpstart healing and prevent infection are also key. These antimicrobial products can help prevent hoof cracks and other trauma. Look for all-natural products that won't cause harm to you or your horse. For example, Vetericyn hoof care and hoof soak products are perfect for the ongoing maintenance of your horse's hooves.

Tips to Prevent White Line Disease

Now that we understand what white line disease is and how it can be treated in horses, let's look at some tips to hopefully prevent the condition in the first place:

- Keep your horse's hooves well-trimmed and balanced with horse hoof cleaning. Trimming their hooves regularly will help prevent abscesses in horses or tearing or cracking.
- Try to exercise your horse enough. White line disease is more common in stalled horses, or show horses who might not get enough pasture time.
- White line disease can often be a secondary complication to something else going on in the hoof. Make sure to examine your horse's hooves regularly to avoid old nail tracks, areas of hoof wall separation, and any other concerns.
- Practice proper hoof care. This includes picking your horse's feet daily.
- In overly wet conditions, take even more care of your horse and their hoof health by providing a clean, dry environment.

Here at Vetericyn, we believe it's important that we take care of our equine friends by treating their skin and hooves with proper care. Not only do horses need adequate exercise, a healthy diet, and regular grooming, but they also need hoof capsule maintenance to keep them healthy and active

How Hot is Too Hot to Ride?

For many riders, summer brings the most time to spend in the saddle. Days are longer and horse activities abound. This season is also typically when heat-related risks are highest. With intense exercise in hot weather, the horse's internal temperature can briefly climb as high as 108° Fahrenheit. To recover, the horse is not just battling the ambient temperature, but also his body's ability to cool itself. So how hot is too hot to ride?

When you're training toward a goal, consistency is important, but be mindful when you ride to avoid overheating—or worse. "The coastal humidity in Florida multiplies the heat index substantially because it reduces the body's ability to dissipate heat through evaporation or sweating," explains Caitlyn Henderson, DVM, of Peterson Smith Equine Hospital in Ocala, one of Florida's largest equine clinics. "It's akin to trying to breathe and cool yourself from under a hot, wet blanket." In addition to not riding during midday, Henderson always advises having a shaded area where horse and rider can take short breaks. Keep buckets of cool water available so the horse can drink. When humidity climbs, it helps to add a misting fan if the area has access to electricity.

Horses at Risk of Overheating

Certain horses are more vulnerable to overheating. These include:

- Old or very young
- Not acclimated to climate
- Out of condition
- Heavily-muscled, thicker body types
- Diagnosed with an endocrine disease, like PPID (Cushing's disease)
- History of equine asthma
- Recovering from a recent respiratory challenge
- Diagnosed with anhidrosis (partial or total inability to sweat)

Keep Horses Drinking When It's Hot

Hydration is critical for horses in hot weather. Electrolyte loss due to exercise or simply sweating can lead to metabolic stress and decrease the horse's thirst response, which can result in dehydration and overheating. In addition to access to salt (plain or trace mineral), horses may need electrolyte supplementation to replenish the sodium, potassium, calcium, and chloride lost through sweating and urination. Henderson tells riders to prepare for summer temps by introducing electrolytes to the horse's diet earlier in the year. The goal is to encourage water intake year-round, so horses are always well hydrated before exercising.

Cool Down

Many people think the best way to cool a hot horse after exercise is just to walk him in the shade. However, research shows that the most efficient method is to continuously shower a stationary horse with cool (79° Fahrenheit) tap water. In a recent study, this method decreased the horse's core temperature in an average of just two minutes. "Focus water on the jugular vein and the large veins inside the legs," says Staten, noting that this helps cool the horse's core temperature.

Finish cooling out by slowly walking the horse until his respiratory rate and body temperature are normal. Movement helps remove lactic acid from the system and keeps muscles from tightening up. Always allow the horse to drink during recovery. Research shows that horses voluntarily drink more within the first hour after exercise when water is about 68° Fahrenheit. Offer half a gallon of water at a time throughout the cool-down process until the horse doesn't want to drink any more. Make sure there is plenty of water in his stall/corral to drink after he's totally cooled out.

Why Are Horses Fearful?

Fear can be useful in the wild. It allows a horse to avoid danger from predators. For a domesticated horse, it proves be to problematic though. A fearful horse on the ground or under saddle is unpredictable and dangerous to be around. They can become a safety hazard to their handler and rider. You never know when they may bolt or lash out. It's important to know why your horse is acting fearful, so you can help them work through this feeling.

Why Are Horses Fearful?

- 1. Environment: Often, they become fearful because of an environmental trigger. There may be a new or unusual object or noise. If a horse isn't properly socialized and desensitized, they may struggle in new situations. Uncertainty can creep up and the horse's natural instincts take over. They need to have confidence in their handler and rider to work through the situation without escalating to a dangerous level.
- 2. Past Experiences: An anxious horse needs an experienced handler. They often mirror the anxiety of their person. If they haven't had good experiences in the past, this can lead them to be untrusting. Additionally, if their training was rushed or aggressive, they will likely have holes in their foundation. These will become more visible in new environments.
- 3. Natural Instincts: Horses are flight animals. Generally, they choose to run before fighting. This fight or flight response can be more obvious in some horses. These flightier horses tend to always be on high alert. Their anxiety is usually increased when they're away from their herd, which is usually the horse's safe zone. It's important they develop trust and security with you, so the two of you can create your own herd when out riding and in the barn.

A calm, patient handler can bring confidence to a fearful horse. They will need time and consistently. You should expose them to new situations and objects in manageable steps. Always reward them when they should signs of being relaxed. It will take them, but any horse can learn to trust.
